

2 PhD positions offered to research on "Urbanism, Political and Development Strategies"

Application Deadline 15.12.16

Within the European Joint Doctorate Programme urbanHist | 20th Century European Urbanism Bauhaus-Universität Weimar (Germany) offers 2 PhD positions in the field of "Urbanism, Political and Development Strategies".

The task "Urbanism, Political and Development Strategies" deals with one of the historically main functions of European urbanism since the early 20th century, namely, the definition and implementation of development strategies for the whole society through spatial policies. As a state-run activity, urbanism had numerous functions during the first half of the 20th century, such as the adaptation of territories to new phases of (de-)industrialisation, the implementation and adaption of the social welfare state with infrastructure and housing construction or the execution of economic policies. The transition to urban renewal and inner city densification starting in the 1960s increased the value and relevance of urbanism. A special chapter started around 1990, when previously state socialist nations had to fundamentally change their urban development policies. Urbanism became a field of functional, aesthetic and economic adaptation to market economy mechanisms.

The two thesis' in this thematic field will deal with the political determinants of urbanism and the relationship between the political sphere and urbanism.

We foresee two PhD positions to elaborate two fields covering essential aspects of urbanism, political and development strategies, which we define in a general manner:

Position BUW 2.1 "Central planned economies and weak urban planning. Explaining a paradoxon in the European countries of state socialism.

Co-supervision: Univerzita Pavla Jozefa Šafárika v Košiciach – Department of History (Slovakia).

Objective: The Soviet Union and – in the second half of the 20th century – Central, Eastern and Southeastern European state socialist countries applied urbanism as an important instrument for the implementation of a changing social model, although there were important differences (e.g. between Poland and the Soviet Union). However, urban planning remained systematically inferior to sectoral planning. Urban planning was a stronger instrument under some countries of advanced capitalism than state socialism. Even though this is a key aspect to explaining European urbanism history of the 20th century, it has not yet been systematically researched. The PhD thesis will provide a case-study based systematic approach to this gap.

Position BUW 2.2 “Urbanism in Europe in the 20th century – hundred years reforming capitalism”

Co-supervision: Blekinge Tekniska Högskola – Department of Spatial Planning (Sweden).

Objective: The initially reparational, correctional and later designing function of urbanism developed in regard to real cities as a dense materialisation of social conditions, rather than in regard to abstract cities. Except the Soviet Union, this applied to capitalist societies, with though varying political systems from parliamentary democracies to terrorist dictatorships. Housing policy since the 1920s is an example of how the different regimes applied urbanism to continue developing the capitalist model according to a modified mode of reproduction. Housing policy was often a means to re-appropriate resources from real-estate to large industry. This was accompanied by the adoption of Fordist innovations for urban production and, during the final third of the century, a reorientation towards a post-Fordist developmental model. Research in this field will deeper analyse the relation of changing phases of capitalism and urbanism.
